

Escape into Vibrant Colors

The domains of metal, gemstone, glass, clay, wood, fabric and thread had been intertwined with the jewelry and fashion industries for a very long time. Some of the oldest skilled occupations were focused on transforming such materials into expressions of creativity. The possibilities are interminable. Once in a while an artist is discovered who can take such transformation to a level that leaves one astonished.

Ayala Bar is such an artist who came into the world of jewelry from an unusual angle and surprised with unexpected and different designs. She takes these material elements and combines them in ways that makes for impressive statements of exquisite fashionable taste. Surprisingly she also achieves design arrangements that would pick up and accentuate the wearer's garment in ways not often seen in jewelry.

One local fan of Ayala Bar and The Escape, Verna Pratt, describes her work in this way: "It's envisioned by an Israeli woman, whose country is always in turmoil, but her pieces reflect an inner joy for life. They embody happiness, peace and passion. Each one jumps out at you with either its vibrant colors or artful beadwork. Even the industrial pieces catch one's eyes - unique creations that force others to ask about them. Every time I wear a piece, I'm asked where I got it and who made it. They allow me to witness about Georgetown, The Escape and Ayala!"

Verna, with her bubbly personality has many fans herself. As a tireless advocate for Georgetown, the square and shop local/small, she is a favorite customer at The Escape.

She has seen the square grow into the destination it is today and has many compliments for the Downtown Georgetown Association's efforts. It is people like Verna (thankfully there are many around), who embraces the businesses on the square, who also deserve compliments and sincere thanks. She is a great example of how local residents can support the livelihood of the square.
